Executive Summary

Orange County’s food production industry holds enormous potential for economic growth as both the demand for locally grown foods and the number of Central Florida visitors continues to increase. To spur the development of the County’s food production sector, the East Central Florida Regional Planning Council (ECFRPC) developed the Orange County Food Strategic Plan which is divided into three sections. The first part of the document is an inventory of the County’s food production assets, which includes all properties currently used for agricultural purposes and all food production facilities (farms, food processing and distribution companies). These assets were mapped using Geographic Information System (GIS) software based on data provided by a variety of sources including the Orange County Property Appraiser, state and local governments, and private company websites. This analysis found that there are over 142,000 acres classified as agricultural. Most of these properties are located in areas subject to high development pressures. The ECFRPC also identified over 200 food production facilities located within Orange County. These include 45 farms, 102 food processing establishments, and 54 food distribution businesses with warehousing facilities. While small, Orange County’s food production sector has a strong connection with the tourism and restaurant industries.

The second part of the strategic plan is an audit of the land use policies and zoning regulations for the County and its six largest municipalities (Apopka, Maitland, Ocoee, Orlando, Winter Garden, and Winter Park). This analysis involved reviewing all relevant planning documents such as comprehensive plans, zoning codes, and sustainability plans. The purpose here was to identify any regulatory barriers that prevent the food production sector from achieving its full potential. The review found that most zoning codes are not friendly towards food production. Many jurisdictions treat food production as a thing of the past and there is a strong bias to protect residential uses. While there have been some attempts to increase production programs, such as the urban chicken pilot programs, they seem like hobby type uses and do not possess the capacity to have a major impact on local food production. Based on the ECFRPC’s analysis, the friendliest jurisdictions toward food production uses are the cities of Apopka and Orlando.

Finally, the Strategic Plan’s implementation section lists over 30 strategies that could be used to increase the visibility of Orange County’s Food Production Sector, encourage agriculture in Orange County, expand food entrepreneurship, and increase alternative food distribution methods in low-income communities. The ECFRPC will be working with the members of the Good Food Central Florida, the region’s food policy council, to implement these strategies.
